How the Program Works

State Standards/Research-Based

Learning for Life features age-appropriate, theme-oriented content to enhance and support your core homeschool curriculum. The Learning for Life curriculum team has uniquely blended character development traits into each research-based lesson as well as ensuring that all lessons are aligned to core curriculum standards in all 50 states. Learning for Life enables your child to practice and reinforce subject matter skills while learning critical character development and life skills at the same time.

Family Activity

Every lesson incorporates at least one family activity that your child can do with you, and in some cases, with the rest of the family. The family activity reinforces the lesson and gives parents/guardians, and other family members an opportunity to participate in the character development and success of your child.

Recognition Plan

Learning for Life offers a recognition certificate along with other incentives for your child that will motivate positive behavior, assist in building self-esteem, and reward a positive work ethic.

Student Activities

Learning for Life incorporates an action-learning process and uses teaching techniques that include role-playing, reflective and moral dilemma exercises, and hands-on activities. The reflective portion of each lesson is the pivotal point at which your child will have the opportunity to think about what he or she has learned and integrate that experience into real life. The activities build into each lesson are easily related to core curriculum subjects and should insure that your child meets state and national standards. Lessons are developed to reinforce academic, social, ethical, and character development skills, such as critical and creative thinking, conflict resolution, decision making, interpersonal relationships, practical life skills, self-esteem, writing and language arts, citizenship and personal fitness.
